Re: Yarns

The evidence multiplies that—to use Mr. Spurgeon's famous expression—it is hot, very hot. In the wide city the man most to be commiserated to-day is the policeman on duty in some important thoroughfare. His dress, to begin with, is not suitable when the glass stands at three figures; and he has to wear it all day long, while he keeps him constantly on the move, with no opportunities for those little lotterings and blandishments so popularly connected (untruthfully, no doubt) with his profession. He has not even the privilege of getting in the shade, particularly if his beat lies northwards, where the sun beats down upon him with pardonable distastefulness under a verandah, or looks into a shop window on the transparent pretext that some one on whom he deems it necessary to keep an eye has just entered the establishment. But the appearance of his officer in the distance, or of a superior, is enough to make him dash off the glare, destroy at once his vision of peace. It is an odd peculiarity of persons addicted to the vice of intemperance—most observant people must have noticed it—that when they've had their considerate thought, and what the next best thing would be, suddenly a good deal too much, their chief efforts appear to be directed to securing a position so conspicuous as to invite universal attention. To-day, for instance, against the corner yarder, out in the blinding sunshine, leans one who, from his dress and general intelligence might seem to know that in the corner of the street in shade a few yards west might be found a convenient doorestop. But this terrible desire for ostentation has possessed him. Happy himself, he little thinks of others' misery in contemplating him. He looks a pace or two, standing—a country soldier, perhaps, in uniform and subaltern's cap—stands in a large way—and so instead of sidling up the bye street, taking to the vacant doorestop, and looking fixedly south, he stubbornly keeps his back to the blistering corner and blinks doggedly north. The constable's position was painful. To the other side of the position was danger. To the other side of the position was heat. The world here would have been irony. To come to "move on," would have meant to go to the pillar of solar glare with a voluble and perhaps abusive companion. But the bus rolls by, leaving the bewildered tradesman bubbling at the noonday sun, and the unhappy police officer cogitating on the best course to follow.

WAGES AT THE CARRARA MARBLE

TO THE EDITOR OF THE HERALD.

Probably the most important ordinance now being considered by the Ceylon Council, is that dealing with the labour question. The Government is giving every opportunity for a discussion of the subject by those interested, and the various district assemblies have already begun to give serious consideration to it. In some quarters it is thought that an amending or repealing measure of the kind can only have the effect of making conditions worse confounded.

LITERATURE FOR WOMEN

Englishmen of the present day affect the Pindaric Springs as zealously as their ancestors formerly did the Bath waters, and their American sisters, the "Goddesses of the Springs," as you call them, are as much enamoured of such fads of philosophy and science as fair-haired Apollo the escaped masculine interloper. At first blush, therefore, our subject may appear superfluous, a white elephant in the "Woman's Column." Nevertheless, it may well be questionable whether a real love of literature, as deep as that which we saw in Great Greece, is to be met with as the bookish aspect of the age won't seem to warrant. On this side the ocean we can scarce lay claim to it. Go where you will, in our metropolitan circles, in those of our country towns, in the homestead of the squatter, note the taste of the women, and you will find that the present age has no more of the "flavour of Attic salt," and than as whether we can boast a fair proportion of well-informed women. And why, with the ample means and leisure at command of so many, with the

The biographies of literary and other notable form another branch of reading, valuable in many ways, although too often highly coloured and partial. One outcome of the much travelling has been the publication of many books of travel, and for those to whom the pilgrim's staff still seems obtainable as the Koh-i-noor, what store of delight are here opened up. The old carpets of the Arabian magician has ceased to be a fable, and by the aid of Layard, Warburton, Arthur, Stansley, Baker, Livingstone, Campton, Wallace, Buxarney, and a score of others they may royaume where they will, unearthing old empires and exploring new lands, while a dip into Macderville and a up the cudgels for those ungrateful wretches? Mr friend was referring to the much-neglected subject an opinion on the matter, especially where the defence of those attacked is concerned. It is right the encroachments of those engaged in their service; but it is hard to see why the desire of the latter to "bitter themselves" should always be cast in their teeth as such a monstrous piece of ingratitude. Do we not all wish to better ourselves? Is not the mistress ever striving to get her foot upon a higher rung of the social ladder? Does not her master take advantage of every change of fortune to "better himself"? Yet in the poor drudge who has to depend upon her own hard work for a livelihood, this desire to get a better position is regarded as the basest and blackest of ingratitude.

In the ordinary relations between mistress and maid, the cause for gratitude can hardly be considered to exist. The maid is paid, and she gives an equivalent in work—in most cases, real downright hard labor. She is invariably honest, mostly civil. Do mistresses forget, when they demand such perfection from their servants, that they are far from being perfect all, and tends to our highest development and the happiness of the greatest number. Servants are as Could any business be carried on without such business facts? I know as a fact that no business can be carried on without such business facts, and there is no object in advancing in the way of doing business without such business facts. I hope to show the extent of our liabilities. Hoping that the business interests of myself will cause the question to be discussed. S. E. SQUIBBS.

livens and conception, and so become lovers, according to our order of artistic intelligence, of all those things that make for culture. In England these "benign conditions" exist to a far greater degree than here. "The colonies," say most people, "is the place to make money;" and money, not strangely, is the one desire to have enough of it, is the god. Our leisure class is few. In the old land "it is many. In England the masses are confronted constantly with new growths in things artistic; here they tread an unvarying path, seeing few new things to move them to observation and to refine them, though what they do see in art and in sculpture in our National Gallery is certainly good.

We are a busy people, and we require to be moved suddenly and powerfully to cause us to pause and see those things that do not consider under the heading of "The business of living." We are as we are, and it is idle to mourn over our condition. There is no occasion to be hopeful. The success of the COWEN concerts, is indicatof growth of taste. And more; if the thirteen concerts were repeated they would be still much better enjoyed and appreciated. They were an education, and as such they leave their influence behind them. A good collection of pictures will also have an educating and refining influence. The impression produced by a series of great pictures will brighten the intelligence to see more clearly and to strive in familiar themes, and to appreciate more comprehensively increased facilities for culture. The members of the New South Wales Art Society have done much to stir up an interest in art here. They have laboured against heavy odds; they have been earnest and persevering; while they do not pretend any more than do other people, who are not evangelists, to work solely for the benefit of their fellow-artists, their fidelity to their art and their ambition to produce good work; and, farther than that, to be something more than an exhibition society they have laboured for the good of their fellows. The society is a teaching institution, how popular however we do not know. If but the State, on its side, did more we should be hopeful for the artistic future of the colonies. There is the great field of the Public schools, in which, as the President of the Art Society suggested some time ago, drawing might be taught to greater purpose. But art like science must slowly, slowly creeping on from point to point," and we must be content to wait. Meanwhile there appear evidences that what the Government has spent in works of art has not been wasted. People will pass from a knowledge of the pictures in our National Gallery to an appreciation of such collections as are coming to us in the Britannia.

A discussion, which is by no means uninteresting in Australia, has been taking place in London over the real merits of the practical results of the Salvation Army. This peculiar religious organisation, which offends the taste of a good many people by its noise and the coarseness of its methods, has received a great deal of sympathy and support on account of its aims. There are very few of us who delight in having church services by torchlight, or in seeing women kneel to pray aloud in the streets, or in being deafened by music loud in proportion to its badness; but we are yet willing to put up with that, and a great deal more, if it only the immediate being made moral and the reckless are being made self-respecting. But at the same time we are entitled to ask whether and how far these alleged results are being realised, and whether the outward display is compensated for by a secret success.

The Salvation Army has not only been a distress to many citizens who love peace and quietness, but it has also by its self-ascension raised a serious question right of persons to obstruct the public streets, or to a shop, but for their motives, could be challenged as creating a nuisance. In their self-assertion they have gone a long way to challenge the Civil authority, and to establish precedents for disorderly mobs; and many citizens who wish them success and who hope that they are achieving it, have found it a little difficult to forgive their defiance of ordinary corporate restraints.

That there was a great work to do when the Salvation Army first brought itself into London, cannot be denied, and the work still remains to be done. Our modern civilisation has its dregs, and this moral residuum neither destroys itself, nor will humanity allow it to be destroyed. Life is a race; not only cannot all win, but all cannot get even decently placed, and there are many who give up the struggle as hopeless. It is this want of a decent position

will, this listlessness of people to which leads so many of them to give up trying to be better. It seems to them that the forces against them are too strong, that they have no chance, and that it is not worth while trying; and so they drop back into animal indolence, and just keep life together in the coarsest way. The very repulsiveness of their habits and character and condition makes it difficult for ordinary benevolent people to approach them.

The Salvation Army took up what was largely, though not wholly, a neglected work. It set before itself as a great mission to "attract to itself the neglected and remaining of the forgotten," and preach hope to the hopeless and the justification of the roughness of its methods was that they were necessary in order to attract the attention and meet the tastes of those who had become degraded. It is probable, and we think that experience justifies the criticism, that the value of this cur-roughness has been altogether estimated, and that the best work done by the Army has been due to the sympathy it has extended to the fallen, and to the personal effort of men and women in lifting up the fallen. Still it is not worth while to be too analytic over a process that is effective, or to discourage useful labourers by finding fault with the method to which they may be particularly attached.

But that still leaves the question, is the
